The Wonders of Winter

Tis’ the season for holiday gatherings, drinking hot cocoa, and cozy, snowy nights. For many this time of year can truly be magical. For some, however, winter can be a particularly blue time of the year. Darker, colder days and the post-holiday letdown often cause a decline in mood and motivation. Just like adults, it’s normal for kids to experience emotional ups and downs, including the winter blues. This is a time when kids may be especially vulnerable to increased moodiness and irritability.

Parents and educators can support their children and students as they cope with seasonal sadness, while being alert to the signs and symptoms of mental health challenges that require expert care. To help you and your family, and/or students cope this winter season, the incredible team of therapists and community partners who help provide services to youth in Sheboygan County through the PATH School-Based Mental Health Community Impact Initiative are here to help provide insight into what may be impacting youth in our community. Throughout this newsletter PATH Partners will provide helpful information, tips, and resources and hopefully offer some comfort in knowing that you and your family are not alone; there is help - there is hope.

Wish you a rejuvenating winter season filled with much joy,

What is Fatigue & How Can Self-Compassion Help?

BY HANNA MAECHTLE
COMMUNITY LEARNING AND ENGAGEMENT TRAINING SPECIALIST
ROGERS BEHAVIORAL HEALTH

As the year wraps, we all have likely experienced times when we felt out of steam. As the winter holidays approach and the cold settles in, many of us have experienced compassion fatigue.

Do these stages sound familiar? Remember the “can-do” energy you gave to prepping for the start of the school year? Or the excitement you felt to decorate your home? This is the Zealot stage. Along the way, however, the natural imperfections around us became clear. We found ourselves moving from the energy of the zealot to the Irritability stage. How many days are left until fall break? How many people are planning to be at our house for Thanksgiving? It’s going to be how cold outside? In addition to the typical challenges that come with Winter, we’re also faced with the continual complexities that is our political climate, ever changing protocols, and a higher demand on those that serve others. The things that once brought us excitement may now make us cynical or frustrated and our hopefulness wanes. This can be overwhelming and lead us to the natural reaction of Withdrawal. The idea of “balancing it all” becomes too much and we begin to question whether or not we can continue to show up how we had hoped. We sleep more, engage less, and find accessing energy for the tasks of caring for others and ourselves increasingly difficult. We struggle to empathize even when it's clear that empathy is needed the most. Some of us move onto the Zombie stage where we shed connections to avoid facing the imperfections and complexities. We trust our ability to “go it alone” with a new level of frenetic energy that can lead to sleeplessness, physical and mental strain, and isolation.

When we find ourselves in these stages, we realize we are not the person we want to be. We have been acting as if this is a sprint instead of a marathon. We have not preserved our balance amidst it all. AND this is the normal human response to overwhelming and complex challenges.
Science has shown that self-compassion makes us less anxious, depressed, and self-critical—and more productive, supportive of others, and physically healthier. If not being able to deal with imperfections and gradually isolating from others are the hallmarks of compassion fatigue, an anecdote exists in self-compassion.

As you reflected on your experiences of compassion fatigue over the past months, what were you thinking and feeling about yourself?

Was there more self-criticism than self-kindness? Did you feel singled out for ways that you might have fallen short or were you aware that you, like all of us, are doing your best and making some mistakes along the way? Are you able to name your feelings to grow your self-awareness without getting pulled into a swirl of negative self-talk?

These three questions help define self-compassion and can become strategies to practice in the weeks ahead as we do our best to connect with friends and family over the holidays.

When you notice that you are experiencing an uncomfortable feeling such as disappointment, anger, or frustration, practice saying three things to yourself (things you would say to a friend):

- “I am sorry you are feeling this way, I know it is tough.”
- “Others experience this painful feeling too and many would understand you.”
- “You have taken the first step to dealing with the feeling by naming it. Good for you! Do you want to let it go or take another action?”
As the days get shorter, darker and colder, many of us experience a shift in mood; many call this “the winter blues.” You, your children, and/or your students may start to feel a loss of energy, have a hard time getting excited about things, or feel down in general.

It’s normal for us as well as kids to experience emotional ups and downs, including the winter blues. As holiday breaks disrupt normal school and social activities this winter, youth may be especially vulnerable to increased moodiness and irritability. And at least one in five kids will have a diagnosable mental health condition that needs treatment.

Parents, caregivers and educators can support children and teens as they cope with seasonal sadness, while being alert to the signs and symptoms of mental health conditions that require expert care.

While changes in mood regulation and an increased sense of uncertainty or weariness may be a normal response to a lack of predictable routine or change in plans, persistent presence of these feelings and behaviors should be noted. Page 6 of this newsletter offers resources and support that anyone can use for support.
FOR TEACHERS

With cold weather, shorter days, and a lack of sunshine usually comes decreased energy, sadness, and irritability. Known as the “winter blues,” these moods, common during the winter months, can negatively impact your school community.

Combat winter blues in the classroom:

1. Take movement breaks

   Even though it may be too cold to go outside, studies show that when children can move around throughout the school day, their concentration levels, behavior, and mood improve. Take a few five-minute breaks to dance, play charades, or follow a short movement video together.

2. Mix up your classroom routine

   Change the pace of the day by switching the order of things. If you notice your students are struggling to focus, ask for a volunteer to come to the front of the class to help you demonstrate a concept. You could even change the seating arrangement or provide alternate seating options.

3. Incorporate bright colors

   Contrast the dull and gray outside with a bright and colorful classroom. Turn a blank wall into a showcase for students’ artwork. Wear bright-colored clothing and encourage students to do the same. The concept of colors influencing mood, emotions, and behaviors is very real, and it’s known as “color psychology.” Each color on the wheel evokes different feelings, good and bad. 4. Organize a class project that helps others

   Acts of kindness and expressing gratitude are shown to improve a person’s mood and broaden their perspective.

   Have your students write thank-you notes to school faculty, one another, and/or their own family members. Plan for students to write encouraging notes to each other. Create a kindness chain where students write an act of kindness they experienced on a slip of paper. These slips are linked and then displayed in your classroom. Students can add to the chain throughout the year.

FOR PARENTS

Though the winter months can be a time for families to reconnect, the change in schedules and routine can prove challenging for children to adjust to.

How to combat winter blues at home:

For Your Children/Teens

1. Maintain open communication

   Be clear about what can be expected during these winter months to help provide structure. It’s okay to be honest if you don’t know the answers to their questions.

2. Relate to your child’s emotions

   Share if you also feel excited, sad, or joyful. By connecting to the feeling the child is experiencing, it provides validation for the child to see that their feelings are welcomed and understood.

3. Plan ahead as much as you can

   This provides your child with a sense of predictability for the events to come. Structure can offer a sense of safety and allow children to be more flexible when changes may occur.

4. Model how to deal with difficult emotions

   When you, as a parent, feels a strong emotion, you have an opportunity to model how to appropriately respond. Allow yourself room to process the emotion in a self-compassionate manner, acknowledge that it is okay to feel this way as everyone has strong emotions, and ask yourself if you need to take action for change or if you need to let the feeling go.

For Yourself

1. Carve out time to just be adults.

   Take the time to make a conscious effort to move away from the added stress of parenthood.

2. Don’t take on too much

   This time of year, it’s easy to get swept up into raising your hand one too many times to organize parties or other festive activities.

3. Perform an act of kindness. Giving your time to help someone else can lift your spirits. You’re not only doing good for other people, but for your mental health as well.

Importance of Getting Involved

Community involvement is beneficial in all areas of life, but perhaps the greatest examples of the profound and inspiring ways that it impacts our society, is when we look at the benefits of community involvement within families and our children.

Getting your child connected to their community gives them a deeper sense of belonging, it allows them to view themselves as an important part of a larger network of people. Community projects bring people together, boosting the mental wellbeing and quality of life to all those involved and has been shown to increase self-esteem.

Community involvement also helps children form social connections through a shared objective, fighting off feelings of loneliness or self-doubt, uniting them with a network of people they can rely on for support, advice and friendship.

Community projects which benefit other people give children a sense of purpose and meaning, taking a break from their own problems and allowing them to focus on the good they can bring to someone else’s life.
